3 strategies for change

There are soo many possibilities..

to drive the change towards a sustainable and globally just society. But with so much variety, it is easy to lose track.

The American sociologist Erik Olin Wright has divided these possibilities into three central strategies of change in order to provide orientation in political work and to develop concrete approaches for change...

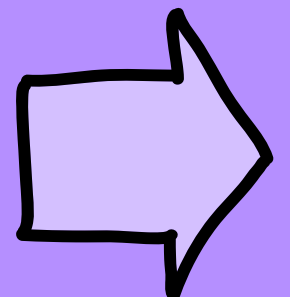

3 strategies for change

Radical Reforms - Transforming Institutions and Policies

Radical reforms means changing laws, rules and institutions step by step. These changes build on what exists today - while keeping the good life for all in mind. They are therefore a strategy that changes the system from within. The idea is that radical reforms are implemented “from above” by the state or fought for by social movements and parties over the state.

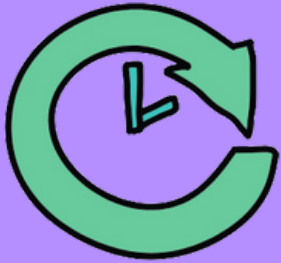

But what does that mean exactly?

4 examples of radical reforms set a 4-day week as normal working hours

Promote agricultural structural laws for a fair distribution of land climate reparations payments for countries in the Global South socialize hospitals

Nowtopias: Building alternatives and testing the Good Life for All

In Nowtopias you can practice a more just and sustainable coexistence on a small scale - in terms of new practices, institutions or organizational forms. Nowtopias are places, spaces or groups in which transformation is driven from below. They arise within the existing system and despite its structures - often in niches - and they give a foretaste of the Good Life for All.

But what does that mean exactly?

4 examples of Nowtopias

organize a reading group

participate in community supported agriculture

join a renewable energy cooperative

organize a solidarity event for change

resist & build counter-power

Resisting and building counter-power means opposing something that is judged to be unjust or unsustainable. This involves seeking direct confrontation with institutions and social structures.

This can be done in a variety of ways, including through organized strikes that disrupt unjust or destructive activities while drawing attention to these injustices.

But what does that mean exactly?

4 examples of resistance and building counter-power:

Start a creative protest performance

Participate in a strike

Co-organize a demonstration

Telling different stories
